CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

"A Bad Bargain" the Topic for Dis-cussion Tomorrow. The topic for discussion by Christian Endeavorers tomorrow will be "A Bad Bargain," with reference in Gen. 25:29-34. The comment on this theme is that "A man is sure to make a bad bargain unless he is a good judge of the value of what he is buying and selling. A little of the world looks very large in our eyes, and honesty, purity, conscience, the soul itself are recklessly bartered for it, regardless of the Master's question. "The following are some suggestions for the fall 'get-everybody-to-work' meeting: prayer meeting more attractive; make the ary meetings more attractive; an open par-

BOOKER WASHINGTON

Honors Bestowed Upon Him by Both North and South.

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION SPEECH

Received by Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle.

IN BOTH VIRGINIAS

The entertainment of Booker Washington at dinner at the White House by President Roosevelt the other evening attracts attention to the honors which have heretofore been bestowed upon that educational leader of his race. A number of instances are shown in the course of the pages of Washington's recently published autobiography, "Up From Slavery." In chapter 11 he

"It is a pleasure for me to add that in all my contact with the white people of the south I have never received a single personal insult. The white people in and near Tuskegee, to an especial degree, seem to count it a privilege to show me all the respect within their power, and often go out of their way to do this. Not very long ago I was making a journey between Dallas, Texas, and Houston. In some way t became known in advance that I was on he train. At nearly every station at which this train stopped numbers of white people, including in most cases the officials of the town, came aboard and introduced themselves and thanked me heartily for the work that I was trying to do for a trip from Augusta, Ga., to Atlanta, being ather tired from much travel, I rode in a Pullman sleeper. When I went into the car, I found there two ladies from Boston whom I knew well. These good ladies were perfectly ignorant, it seems, of the customs of the south, and in the goodness of their hearts, insisted that I take a seat with them in their section. After some hesitation I consented. I had been there but a few minutes when one of them, without my knowledge ordered separate to be consented. my knowledge, ordered supper to be served to the three of us. This embarrassed me still further. The car was full of southern white men, most of whom had their eyes on our party. When I found that supper had been ordered, I tried to contrive some excuse that would permit me to leave the section, but the ladies insisted that I must eat with them. I finally settled back in my seat with a sigh, and said to myself, 'I am in for it now, sure.'

"To add further to the embarrassment of the situation, soon after the supper was placed on the table one of the ladies re-membered that she had in her satchel a special kind of tea which she wished served, and as she felt sure the porter did not know how to brew it properly she insisted upon getting up and preparing and serving it herself. At last the meal was over; and it seemed the longest one that I had ever eaten. When we were through I decided to get myself out of the embarrassing situation and go into the smoking room, where most of the men were by that time, to see how the land lay. In the meantime, however, it had become in some way known through-out the car who I was. When I went into the smoking room I was never more surprised in my life than when each man, nearly every one of them a citizen of Georgia, came up and introduced himself to me and thanked me earnestly for the work I was trying to do for the whole south. This was not flattery, because each one of these individuals knew that he had nothing to gain by trying to flatter me."

A Short Talk to a White Audience. of his desire to speak directly to a representative white audience, an opportunity the gathering, and being then in Boston made a hurried trip to and from that city, remaining in Atlanta one hour for the pur-pose of delivering a five-minute talk. His address was delivered before an audience of about 2,000, mostly northern and southern whites. He said of this: "What I said seemed to be received with favor and enthusiasm. The Atlanta papers the next day commented in friendly terms on my address. I felt that I had in some degree accomplished my object—that of getting a hearing from the dominant class in the

The Tuskegee leader became somewhat closely identified with the Atlanta exposition of 1895, being invited by citizens of Atlanta in the spring of that year to accompany a committee from that city to Washington to appear before Congress to urge government help for the exposition. The Atlanta committee was composed of about twenty-five of the most prominent and influential people of Georgia, all being white but Washington and Bishops Gaines and Grant. Washington delivered an address before the congressional committee. He says: "I spoke for fifteen or twenty minutes and was surprised at the close to receive the hearty congratulations of the Georgia committee and the members of Congress present." At the Atlanta Exposition. Washington was offered the charge of jury of awards to pass upon the education-Nelson Page was made the secretary of that division of the jurors. One of the most notable events in Wash ington's life was the address that he delivered on the opening day of the exposition. One of the New York newspaper correspondents present described that speech as the most significant feature of the day. In his

"When Booker T. Washington stood on the platform of the auditorium with his whole face lit up with the fire of prophecy, Clark Howell, the successor of Henry Grady, said to me 'That man's speech is the beginning of a moral revolution in America.' It is the first time that a negro has made a speech in the south on any important occasion before an audience composed of white men and women. It electrified the audience and the response was as if it had come from the throat of a whirl-wind. • • • At the close of the speech Governor Bullock rushed across the stage and seized the orator's hand. Another shout greeted this demonstration and for a few minutes the two men stood facing each other, hand in hand."

In the spring of 1899 Mr. Washington and his wife went to Europe for several months, the expenses of his journey being paid by Boston friends. In Europe the travelers were received at all points with highest honors. In Paris Mr. Washington was a guest of the University Club of that city at a banquet attended, among others, by ex-President Harrison and Archbishop Ireland. Ambassador Porter presided. In Eng-land the negro travelers were received with ing a number of addresses and being entertained at the residences of some of the most distinguished members of English society. He says in this connection:

"Through the kindness of Lady Aberdeen my wife and I were enabled to go with a party of those who were attending the international congress of women, then in session in London, to see Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle, where afterward we were all the guests of her majesty at tea."

While in Paris an invitation was received from the common council of Charleston, W. Va., to visit that city to deliver an address upon his return to America. The indress upon his return to America. The invitation urged him to accept in order "that we may honor you who have done so much by your life and work to honor us." The invitation was indorsed by Gov. G. W. Atkinson, the secretary of state, the state auditor, other high state officials, ex-Governors Wilson and MacCorkle, leaders of finance in Charleston; the daily newspapers and prominent citizens. The invitation was accepted, and Washington thus describes the occasion:

of Charleston. The governor of the state, Mr. G. W. Atkinson, presided, and an address of welcome was made by ex-Governor MacCorkle. A prominent part in the re-ception was taken by colored citizens. The opera house was filled with citizens of both races, and among the white people were many for whom I had worked when a boy. The next day Governor and Mrs. Atkinson gave me a public reception at the state house, which was attended by all classes. "Not long after this the colored people in Atlanta, Ga., gave me a reception at which the governor of the state presided, and a similar reception was given me at New Or Slavery" is as follows:

"As I write the closing words of this autobiography I find myself-not by design-in the city of Richmond, Va., the city which only a few decades ago was the capital of the southern confederacy and where, about twenty-five years ago, be-cause of my poverty I slept night after night under a sidewalk. This time I am in Richmond as the guest of the colored peo-ple of the city; and came at their request to deliver an address last night to both races in the Academy of Music, the largest and finest audience room in the city. This was the first time that the colored people had ever been permitted to use this hall. The day before I came the city council passed a vote to attend the meeting in a body to hear me speak. The state legis-lature, including the house of delegates and the senate, also passed a unanimous vote to attend in a body. In the presence of hundreds of colored people, many distin-guished white citizens, the city council, the state legislature and state officials, I de-livered my message, which was one of hope and cheer; and from the bottom of my heart I thanked both races for this welcome back to the state that had given me

THAT WHITE HOUSE DINNER.

Protests Against the Southern Clamor at the President. To the Editor of The Evening Star:

The President of the United States, in the exercise of his right to invite whom he pleases to dine at his family table, needs neither apologist nor defender, and it is not as such that I write, but only to express the opinion that the papers and people now making a senseless attack on him for having invited Booker T. Washington to dinner do not voice the sentiments of any considerable number of persons in the south. Had the President invited a number of southern gentlemen, or even ern white man to meet Booker T. Washington it would have justly excited general indignation, because the racial feeling in the south is so generally understood that have been construed as an intentional insult to the white people of that section; but the President did nothing of the kind. Booker T. Washington met, or is reported to have met, only the President's family, and if they did not object to it certainly no one cleable have right to But the President's family. one else has a right to. But that is not all. If it be conceded that the moral improvement of the negro race in the south must and if Booker T. Washington is laboring intelligently and faithfully to that endand this, I think, is not disputed—then the southern people ought not only to feel no indignation at the President's having bestowed on this colored man some signal mark of the esteem in which he holds him, but should applaud that act as an additional evidence of the President's good will toward the south, and I believe that southern people, with few exceptions, will so LAWRENCE WASHINGTON. Alexandria, Va.

To the Editor of The Evening Star:

One cannot but be surprised at the vol-ume of abuse and slander aimed at our chief executive for having entertained a citizen at his table; a man who is acknowl-edged as a leader, and who has done more to develop and raise his own people, morman in this country. If there is a distinc-tion, his people represent in many sections the negro exhibit at the exposition, but as far as I have met, especially in the south, far more law abiding, taxpaying and good citizens than the hordes of worth even mercenary Pharisees from high places to his table, whether very many would rank with Booker T. Washington as men of honor and uprightness and true advo-cates for their country's weal. I may add that many years ago, my maternal grand-father entertained Frederick Douglass (then a siave, I believe) at dinner at his home in England, and the seclusiveness of an English home in those days would ill compare with the democratic principles that should be expected in a republican
